ABOUT ME

Name: Aishwarya Ashok Temgire

Pronouns: She/Her

Sexual orientation: Bisexual 🌈

I was raised in the Gulf for 18 years and I have been in India for the past decade in Pune and Bangalore. I currently reside in Pune. I have lived experience of being an immigrant, something that has made me feel a lack of belonging for the longest time, and I understand the anxiety of trying to find one's identity.

I am a neurodivergent individual, SA and rape survivor and deal with chronic health issues.

In my free time, you can find me watching and rewatching tv shows, get existential, meet with my community, learning new skills, and taking plenty of time to rest and recover by bringing in colors in some form or the other. I'm currently learning to cook, figure my life and practice out around chronic illness and occasionally travel.

Who I am today, and who I am becoming, is a reflection of what accessible and affirming mental health care can make possible.

The therapist I show up as is shaped by my lived experiences. I practice from a place of relational care, empathy, and unconditional positive regard. I center autonomy, move at the client's pace, and approach therapy through a liberation-focused lens that recognizes the impact of social systems on individual well-being. I also love bringing in expressions through various other modalities like art, music, movement and somatic to the sessions.

Therapy, for me, is not a place where people come to be fixed. It is a space where stories are witnessed, parts are welcomed, and experiences that have been carried alone no longer need to remain in isolation.

I believe healing happens in relationship with ourselves, with others, with our bodies, and with the meanings we make of our lives.

My therapy space values curiosity over judgment, compassion over shame, and collaboration over expertise.

I believe therapy can be profound, transformative, and deeply meaningful, but it can also be messy, imperfect, playful, painful, and human. My hope is that the therapy room becomes a place where all of those experiences are welcome and eventually safe.

THANK YOU
